No Medicine for the cure of Rheumatism has ever attained to such a high degree of aver and universality as Johnson's Rheematic Compound. Although but one year before the public, this medicine has justify gained an unbounded popularity. When the originator first introduced it he was convinced to its efficacy, but he little thought it was destined to move such an inestimable blessing to the afflicted; but, true merit can not be suppressed. The attestation of hundreds who have been cured by it must prove the truth of the assertion that it is

From the New York Post.

The result of the recent elections begins to show the leaders of the northern democratio party the truth of what the Evening Post more than once told them during the war, of the inevitable fate of "peace parties." Congress is now settled for three years to come—that is to say, until the 4th of March 1869. Until then the national legislature is Republican in both branches by a very large majority; and it is certain not to repeal the "test oaths," so-called, unless they should be superseded by the adoption of the Amendment.

The defeat of the demogratic party is the most complete it has known. It had the federal patronage to help it; it the defeat patronage to help it; it the sum of the demogratic party is respectable female, who, however, had an admirer, a trumpeter, stationed in the most complete it has known. It had the federal patronage to help it; it had all the advantages resulting from divisions among its opponents, and from the vacillating policy of Congress; but in spite of all this, it has been defeated in every northern state, and by such majorities as put not only Congress but every northern state government in the hands of the Republicans.

The case of the Democratic party new but in spite of all this, it has been defeated in every northern state, and by such majorities as put not only Congress but every northern state government in the hands of the Republicans.

The case of the Democratic party now is, to all practical purposes, the same in which the old federal party found itself after the "second war with Great Britain." That party, including in its ranks a large proportion of the educated and wealthy classes, took the unpopular side against the war of 1812, and found, on the return of peace, that the blunder was irreparable. No amount of talent, experience, public service, or tried patriotism, could avail any man as a candidate of the federal party. At the election of 1816 they could only give their candidate, Rufus King, only the votes of Massachusetts, Connecticut and Delaware. The figures are remarkable. Of two hundred and seventy-one members chosen to the Fortieth Congress, the present democratic party claim but thirty-three.

chosen to the Fortieth Congress, the present democratic party claim but thirty-three.

If the leaders have only as much sense as the old federalists, they will abandon their organization, and merge themselves with the mass of the people, to come forward ugain under other organizations, formed on other issues, as their merits or their afforts may win anew the public respect and confidence. Such was the result in the case of the old federalists. In the new division of parties which followed the election of John Quincy Adams to the Presidency, we find the names of the federal leaders arranged in opposite ranks, and coming forward as candidates or occupants of prominent places, with but slightremembrance of the positions they had occupied during the war. Harrison Gray Otis was elected to Congress in 1822, and to the Senate in 1827. James Buchanan was elected to Congress in 1822, senator in 1837. party organization was abandoned and forgotten.

As an organization, the Democratic party had an opportunity directly after the war to obtain forgiveness for its past offenses and regain the confidence of the people. To do this it should have made itself the party of constitutional progress; the party of equal rights and equal suffrage for all men; the party of law and order everywhere, and of the largest and most comprehensive liberty. The way was open to it, if, its leaders had possessed statesmanship enough to take it. The Republican leaders were timid, hesitating, divided in counsel and distracted by the selfish schemes of a few energetic men among them. Their mistakes left ime of the remember the trecent the recent heavy robbery of coupon bonds and dequate history of the great rebellion. —The star of the demi-monde, Mademac—has returned to Paris from her season at Baden, where she realized the trifling sum of 1,150,000 francs.

With such men, so given over to idols which, if they ever had sound life, are now dead and rotten, the country can sind ought to have nothing to do. They have had every opportunity for repentance: and they have deliberately rejected all chances. As an organization they have become contemptible as well as hateful to the people, who see that these men would fit they could, revive sill the old wrongs of slavery, and reinstate in power over the nation the very assassins who attempted the nation's life.

Whatever good the Democratic party might have done had its leaders been wise, must now be achieved in some other way, and by some other organisation. From the Democratic party no service can be expected; its leaders will probably go on for another quarier century to come, maundering about a Southern alliance, faithfully re-electing the Woods, Seymours and Pendletons; and opposing with all their feebleness every measure of right, justice, liberty and progress—until some day in the next century, they wake up like the good Rip Van Winkle and discover that there has been a war. ing the year. -"Letters from Hell" is the title of a cent London publication. —There is a great scarcity of minis-ters in the Church of England.
